Being imposed geographical isolation, in anticipation you freeze, you tremble in agony of losing your freedom, your life's supports, the other people—you get the bitter taste of the frailty of your existence. Everything seems to crumble, your status, your image. Then you discover how nice it is to comfort yourself to allow the birth of creative thinking to eventuate, a labour of excruciating pain but also the beauty of being yourself, weak and humble, true to your own free space and dimensions.
