Brass and Masks

People often find themselves stumped by the thought of creating art. That each piece must contain a strong expression and conviction, that it must be of purpose. I believe you can find more than enough substance in the appreciation of everyday objects, people and locations by showing these things in ways that pronounce their qualities. You can find endless intrigue in every scene of every day and as an artist I strive to present these moments in my pieces through my own eyes and whatever meaning that a viewer may find while looking at them is as true as the ones I may have had while painting them. I find this true for all works of expression, art or otherwise.
