Isolation meant escaping into new values through the study of new methods of mark marking.

A new language formed during my art practice in isolation, one which housed quieter spaces and denser colours. I am currently playing with the idea of leaving information out...the idea what if less is more.

The challenge was not to translate everything I see, but rather create spaces which house the information, through this idea I was able to work with new techniques, using new tools to make marks, tools around the house were revolutionary. The German expressionists and their use of colour currently influence me.
